Dutch Strivers and Baby Face Dunlap were playing cards when somebody knocked on the door of their flat. Baby Face reached into his shoulder holster and flipped out his pistol. He walked to the door, stood flat against the wall and said:

"Yeah?"Who is it?"

"Me," came a reply from without. "Gentleman Joe Ellis. Open up, Baby Face." Baby Face smiled, and swung open the door. Standing there in the doorway, grinning, was a man roughly fifty years old. He was thin, dapper, and wore a carnation in his lapel.

Baby Face thrust forth his hand, took the elder man's hand, and pumped it vigorously.

"Joe!" he exclaimed. "Sure good to see you. When did you get out?"

Gentleman Joe walked in, and looked guizzically at the ill-furnished, cold-water flat. "I got out last week," he said, "I've been making arrangements for--uh--a job. I had hoped I could depend upon you, Baby Face, You haven't been working, have you?'

Baby Face picked up the cards and put them away.

"No," said Baby Face. "Not too much. Just little jobs here and there.

"All right," said Gentleman Joe, "Then let's sit down and chat, What I've got to say won't take long." The three pulled up chairs, lit cigarets, and Gentleman Joe began sketching idly on a piece of paper.

"It's a million dollar job, Baby Face." It's an armored car job. She runs tonight, about eight-e'clock. She makes four pickups - I've got the exact time checked on each one," Armored cars are tough jobs." Baby Face said.

Dutch Strivers just stored.

"Yes," agreed Gentleman Joe. "I know that. But we don't do it the ordinary way. We steal the car itself!"

"There'll be four packets of cash, wrapped up neatly," Gentleman Joe continued. "In each packet will be a quarter of a million dollars. Now, here's what we'll do -- and just how we'll do it"

"We'll knock off the armored car guard and driver. That'll be yours and Dutch's job. Then, you get in the car, drive it down Purse Street, while Dutch, in back throws the packets out. I'll be waiting in a basement apartment I've rented, and I'll pick up the packets. Then . . . "

Gentleman Joe paused, then continued: . . . by this time the cops will be after you. But we outsmart the cops when you make an abrupt turn, leap from the car when you're out of sight of the law, and let it crash through the guard rail and into the river. You then join me at the apartment -- and we'll divide the cash. The cops will figure you went into the river with the car. They'll be concentrating on that while we make our getaway. Okay?'' Dutch and Baby Face shook hands with Joe, voiced their approval of the plan, then saw him to the door.

Baby Face then turned to Dutch and said. "We're in business now! Big business, We'll each have a third of a million clams!"

"Yeah," growled Dutch, "Maybe!" On the following night, as prearranged, Dutch stood on one side of the street, while Baby

Face kept in the shadows on the other side. Then the armored car drew up to one of its stops and parked. The guard stepped from the car to meet the two special policemen, and Dutch Strivers started guard slumped to the street, alongside one of the special police. The other special started pumping shots at Dutch, but Baby Face's gun barked from across the street, and the special went down.

Baby Face ran to the car, dragged the dead driver out, then shouted to Dutch to get in. They could hear sirens approaching.

"Get in the back with the cash," Baby Face said. "I'll drive this tin heap."

Then the armored car headed for Purse Street.

"Okay," said Baby Face. "We're on Purse Street now. Get ready to unload 'em."
"We gotta work fast," Dutch said -- pitching out the packets. "The cops are turning into Purse Street now."

At the corner, by the river, Dutch leaped into the shadows of the street. Then Baby Face turned the corner, leaped out himself, as the armored car hit the guard rail, hurtling into the water. From the shadows the two watched the police cars stop at the broken guard rail. "Couldn't make the corner," said one policeman. "Call the harbor dredge-and we'll fish'em out."

"Okay," Baby Face whispered. "We got 'em fooled! Let's join Gentleman Joe in the

"Yeah," said Dutch, "Him -- and a million dollars!"

They entered the flat, looked around, and stared in amazement. Gentleman Joe was nowhere to be seen.

"You sure he picked up the packets?" Baby Face asked?"

"Very sure," said Dutch, "I saw him!"

"I think it's the double cross," said Baby Face, grimly.

"He ran out on us?" asked Dutch, in astonishment. "But he wouldn't dare! He knows we'd hunt him down and kill 'im!" "Sure, "answered Baby Face. "So he probably plans to leave the country! Come on,

Dutch, we've got to act fast! We're taking a cab to the airport!"

At the airport, Gentleman Joe paced back and forth. Under one arm were four packets, still wrapped as they were when Dutch tossed them to the street. He glanced at the wall clock. Only ten minutes more, and he'd be one his way to Mexico. Then he saw two figures striding across the room toward him. He gasped, then said: "Dutch! Baby Face! don't do it, guys! Please ---"

Both Baby Face and Dutch fired, and Gentleman Joe coughed, clutched his chest, and dropped next to the packets. People scattered, and a women screamed. Then two policeman came through the doorway -- guns roaring.

Dutch grabbed his throat, gurgled, and flopped. Baby Face, holding the packets, fired as he raced toward an exit.

One of the policeman took aim and fired. Baby Face dropped the packets, flung his arms out, uttered a hoarse cry, and toppled.

One of the policemen picked up the packets and opened them.

"These must've been the armored car thugs we got word on tonight," he said.

"Yeah -- those are the four packets, just as they were described by headquarters," said the other policeman. "They didn't even open them."

"They should've!" said the first policeman. "They would've gotten the surprise of their lives!"

"Why?" said the second one.

"There's nothing but rags,"he said. "They killed themselves and four others just for rags!" "But why would they have packets of rags picked up by an armored car?"

The first policeman replied, "The armored car was strictly a front!".
